

Midori Yama Budokai: Hanshi's Corner
Written by Ron Rogers Hanshi Meiyo Kyoju

November 2013

Ichigo, ichi e: One life, one meeting

There comes a rest at last,
Not always with life's dazzling snow
Keep piling up so fast
Sekiu

Yugen* or Profound Grace and Subtlety

Yugen has three different shades of meaning. The exact translation of the word depends on the context.

1. Yugen may refer to mysterious skills and secrets of the master which have come from his direct experience and spiritual discipline. This concept is based on Chinese philosophy.
2. Yugen may refer to the power of expression, varying between subtle suggestion and explicit statement used by the master. Yugen suggests that beyond what can be said. However, it is not an allusion to another world, but it is about this world, this experience. Yugen is said to mean “a profound, mysterious sense of the beauty of the universe... and the sad beauty of human suffering.”
3. Yugen may refer to the ten orthodox styles of Fujiwara no Teika in his treatises. In the criticism of Japanese waka poetry, it was used to describe the subtle profundity of things that are only vaguely suggested by the poems, and was also the name of a style of poetry.
 - Suggestiveness
 - Charm
 - Dynamic Stillness
 - Gentleness
 - Tranquility
 - Serenity
 - Irregularity
 - Asymmetry
 - No-mind (Zen)
 - No-action (Tao)

These subtle suggestions aim at “expressing something inexpressible,” i.e. Yugen. Yugen is one of three ideals which define Japanese aesthetics. The other two are wabi, transient and stark beauty, and sabi, the beauty of natural patina and aging. If you have children (or even if you do not!) I recommend the book Wabi Sabi, written by Mark Reibstein and illustrated by Ed Young, which explains these concepts well – what they are and what they are not. The main character is an ordinary cat named...Wabi Sabi. These concepts are reflected in all Japanese geido or traditional Japanese arts: Noh (theater), kado (Japanese flower arrangement), shodo (Japanese calligraphy), sado (Japanese tea ceremony; aka cha no yu), and yakimono (Japanese pottery). To introduce discipline into their training, Japanese warriors followed the example of the arts that systematized practice through prescribed forms called kata. This led to combat techniques becoming known as the martial arts. The Sword and Brush (Bunbu no Ichi), the spirit of the martial arts, shows the affinity of the martial arts with the other arts. The philosophy of these arts is referred to as geido ron. In traditional dojo, there is a particular place reserved for beauty, simplicity and reverence, known as shindin.

Wuwei or Non-interference

This is a Taoist concept. It is the Taoist belief that it is best to let the universe function as the universe does without our physical interference in its flow and destiny. Wuwei is an accepting of this flow of life and of all things in the universe. However, wuwei is not nihilism, for nihilism has hopelessness, whereas wuwei retains hope that all will work for the best. The American adage would be, "If it's not broke, don't fix it!"

Chinese Physical Culture Association

This association was formed in Honolulu, Hawaii in 1992. At first it was taught only to Chinese descendants. The association had many teachers, each of whom taught their style of ch'uan fa. The Hawaiian population could not pronounce ch'uan fa and began calling the Chinese fist arts kung fu, a Chinese phrase meaning "hard work," and may refer to any discipline requiring strict or extensive training. As this was easier to pronounce, the term was picked up by Americans living and visiting in Hawaii. The Chinese word for "Martial Arts," is wushu. Hawaii Karate Senin Kai was the first organization to teach occidentals. It was formed in 1933 in Honolulu, Hawaii by Mutsu Zuiho, Higaonna Kamesuke and Thomas Miyashiro, and lasted until 1936, when Miyashiro retired.

Kan or Intuition

Ken no me wa yowaku; kan no me watsuyoi means "the sight of the eyes is weak, but the sight of intuition is strong." This refers to the importance of sensing danger, rather than relying only on sight. One must be aware and adaptable in dangerous situations.

Ken wa me de miru; kan wa kokoro means "the eyes have ordinary sight, but the heart sees." This is another way of emphasizing intuition, which may "see" danger sooner than the eyes.

Kongorishiki or Guardians

These were the statues guarding the entrances to Japanese gates of Buddhist temples, and were often in karate stances. They originally came from India where they were known as nio Bodhisattvas. The term nio-dachi is derived from these statues. Nio-dachi is better known as gyaku zenkutsu dachi (found in Shotokan's Enbi), or "Okinawan back stance." Usually there are two Bodhisattvas, one representing the in aspect and the other the yo aspect. Also, one is breathing in and one breathing out, the a um (om), or breath of Buddha.

Sunyata or Emptiness

Sunyata is the Sanskrit pronunciation of the "kara" in karate. This is the "kara" meaning "empty" as adopted in 1936 by a council of karate masters. These masters knew and accepted the Buddhist association of sunyata with kara. As most of them were at least nominal Buddhists, there was no problem. This does not mean that karate is a "Buddhist religion." First, Buddhism is a philosophy, not a religion. Secondly, the idea of "kara" was the salient point, not its origin. “Kara” of course means “empty,” “emptiness,” or “void.” In regard to its metaphysical concept, sunyata holds that all basic principles of life emanate from within an infinite and pristine Being, and that man holds no power separately. This is the meaning of “empty.” In this context, there is nothing contrary to other beliefs. Buddhism is a philosophy; karate is an art.

Eratta

Kawa no kokoro or a “mind like a river, which is ever flowing refers to continuity and the idea of being unstoppable. Mizu no kokoro or a “mind like water,” refers to a mental state in which the mind is like the surface of a calm body of water. It absorbs everything, reflects everything and is attached to nothing.

Kun tow denotes a modified Chinese form of ch’uan fa, when practiced outside of China. It especially refers to arts studied in Indonesia and Malaya. For example, Soetji Hati is a central Java form of unarmed combat based on Chinese ch’uan fa, and as such is a form of kun tow.

Makoto has at least three distinct meanings: 1) a “pure” or “stainless” mind, undisturbed by external nonessentials, 2) “sincerity,” as in “the word of a warrior, and 3) enlightenment by hard work.

Narande is a command to line up in any order, even disregarding rank. This is usually used when classes are taught and the instructor wants to make a point. Seiretsu, however, is a command to line up in order of rank. Yasume (more politely, o-yasume) is a command to relax during training. Yame is a command to stop what you are doing.

Shodan-ho is used as an intermediate rank between Ikkyu and Shodan. This is referred to as a probationary rank, and usually relates to the age of the budoka. That is, due to how young s/he may be, some time is used to judge the maturity level. Some styles use shiro-soto and shiro-naka as further probationary ranks. This gives two intermediate ranks between Ikkyu and Shodan. Shiro-soto is a black belt with a longitudinal white stripe running the length of the belt on the outside, as the black belt for women within the Kodokan. Wilson Kanchō was instrumental in having this dichotomy of rank stopped in the United States, beginning in the Southeast. Consequently, all women trained by him wore the solid black belt just as the men. When questioned about their belts, the women would state “my sensei gave it to me,” which Wilson Kanchō would verify. He stated that if he trained a black belt, s/he was a black belt, not a black and white belt. At the second probationary level, the belt is reversed, placing the white stripe inside (naka). There some schools who use the probationary levels (Nidan-ho, Sandan-ho, etc) for all ranks up to Godan. In many instances, these are more concerned with the monetary rewards from extra ranks, rather than testing the candidate for his or her next rank. The test for correct use would be – is the candidate actually being observed and, more importantly, will they advance to the actual rank at the end of the observation period without additional testing or payment!

Any or all of this information may be copied for students if desired. All that’s asked is that acknowledgment of authorship be given.